The role of CT, US, and MR imaging in staging of neoplastic disease of the pancreas. Computed tomography (CT), ultrasonography (US), and magnetic resonance (MR) imaging were compared as primary modalities for the staging of neoplastic disease of the pancreas. The results of a retrospective analysis of 74 patients evaluated with these imaging techniques during the period 1982-1986 at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, MN, are reported. Accuracy in staging of local, regional, and distant metastases was compared between the three imaging methods, and accuracy was compared with the results of histopathologic staging. Ninety-six percent of the patients had malignant neoplasms, and the remainder had benign lesions. Accuracy in local, regional, and distant staging by MR imaging was 96%, 80%, and 67%, respectively, and for CT was 95%, 83%, and 56%, respectively. Accuracy by CT was significantly greater than by MR imaging for the determination of local (p less than 0.05) and regional (p less than 0.01) metastases, and tended to be greater for distant ($p = 0.06$) staging. MR imaging provided the greatest number of correct and incorrect diagnoses (60 and 22, respectively). Not a Pretty Picture I know this is a column about can't go wrong art but I'm not even going to lie that this was a tough one to paint. I have a hard time doing human figures and body proportions because I'm a perfectionist (note: I'm not an artist). This is a study in texture because she is an unclothed warriorress, which I don 82157476af
